Introduction

Over one hundred occupations in New York State require some type of license, registration, or certification by a state agency. This survey provides information about statutory restrictions placed on licensure of individuals with criminal records and about the procedures available to appeal a denial of licensure, registration, or certification based on an individual's criminal history.

For over thirty years, the Legal Action Center has worked with individuals with criminal records who are seeking employment. Our experience is that many people, including individuals with criminal records and those who counsel them, mistakenly believe that persons with criminal records are barred from obtaining most occupational licenses. As a result, many individuals with criminal records do not pursue employment opportunities that otherwise might have been available to them.

This survey can assist individuals with criminal records, employment counselors, and others who work with them to identify those State licenses for which they are eligible. (This survey does not cover federal licenses or other federal employment barriers.) The survey shows that there are only a few statutes that automatically bar individuals with criminal records from licensure solely on the basis of past convictions, and most of those statutes provide for lifting the automatic bar when an individual is granted a Certificate of Relief from Disabilities, a Certificate of Good Conduct, or Executive Clemency (pardon).

Although Certificates of Relief and Good Conduct lift automatic bars, individuals with criminal records may still be denied licenses based upon their conviction records. Licensing agencies are required by Article 23-A of the New York Correction Law (§§ 750-55) to make licensing decisions on a case-by-case basis. The law prohibits an agency from denying an individual with a criminal record a license because of his or her conviction record unless the individual's conviction(s) is (are) "directly related" to the specific license sought or the issuance of the license would create "an unreasonable risk to property or to the safety" of people (§ 752).

In determining job-relatedness and risk to the public or to property, licensing agencies must consider the following factors:

1. New York's public policy to encourage the licensing and employment of individuals with criminal records;
2. The specific duties and responsibilities necessarily related to the license being applied for, and the bearing, if any, that the individual's criminal history will have on his or her fitness to perform these duties and responsibilities;
3. The time that has elapsed since the individual's criminal conduct, and the individual's age at the time of the occurrence;

4. The seriousness of the individual's offense(s);
5. The legitimate interest of the licensing agency in protecting property, specific persons, or the general public; and
6. Any evidence of rehabilitation that an individual with a criminal record presents, including a Certificate of Relief from Disabilities or Certificate of Good Conduct. (Certificates of Relief and Good Conduct create a presumption of rehabilitation.)

In determining whether a particular individual's convictions are, or are not, so related to the licensure sought as to justify a denial, licensing agencies must proceed on a case-by-case basis.

Some other statutes do not contain any automatic bar for individuals with criminal records but do restrict licensure or certification to persons of "good moral character." The meaning of this requirement may vary depending upon the licensing agency and the occupation or profession involved; more often than not, however, an applicant's criminal history will be taken into account as reflecting on his or her moral character. Again, the criminal record should be evaluated in accordance with Article 23-A.

How to Use This Survey

The first column of the survey lists occupations in alphabetical order. The occupational titles are taken from the statutory language, and thus may not necessarily be the most common title. For example, "Doctor" is listed as "Physician," and "Lawyer" as "Attorney."

The second column, "Agency," provides the name of the city or state agency that issues that particular license. A list of addresses and phone numbers for the agencies is attached as Appendix B.

The third column lists any information found in the licensing statute concerning specific restrictions placed on individuals with criminal records. The column specifies whether the restriction is mandatory (meaning that the licensing agency may not issue a license to someone with this conviction), or discretionary. For example, an applicant for licensure as an Alcoholic Beverage Manufacturer is automatically barred if s/he has been convicted of a felony or of certain offenses listed in the statute. On the other hand, an applicant for licensure as a barber or wrestler may be denied a license because of a conviction or because of having consorted with someone with a conviction. In some instances, the statute differentiates between people applying for licenses versus those who are convicted of a crime after holding a license.

The information about criminal record restrictions is followed by a citation to the statute containing the restriction. If the statute imposes a different restriction for people who are applying for the license, as opposed to those who are convicted of crimes once they hold a license, then the column explains that distinction as well.

The fourth column describes the circumstances under which a bar may (or in some cases, must) be lifted, such as after passage of a certain amount of time, at the discretion of the licensing agency, or upon receipt of a pardon.

The fifth column, "Related Restrictions or Requirements," lists information about restrictions or requirements that may not bar an individual with a criminal record from licensure but are likely to have some bearing on whether the licensure or certification will be issued. The most common example is a "Good Moral Character" requirement. For example, applicants for licenses issued by the State Education Department, which is responsible for issuing licenses for such medical occupations as nursing, ophthalmic dispensing, and occupational therapy and certifications for, among others, the fields of psychology, teaching, social work, and shorthand reporting, must show good moral character.

The fifth column also states whether the applicant for licensure must be fingerprinted or bonded. Fingerprints are usually used to request a copy of the applicant's Criminal History Record from the State Division of Criminal Justice Services (DCJS). If the applicant is required to be bonded, the bonding agency will probably inquire into criminal records and have access to the DCJS file. Thus, even though there may be no specific criminal record restrictions listed for a particular license, other requirements or restrictions may affect an individual with a criminal record's application for licensure.

If an applicant is denied a license based on a criminal record, s/he may appeal the decision in one of several ways. Some licensing statutes have specific provisions for hearings, written appeals or court proceedings that an applicant may pursue. Those provisions are listed in the fifth column, "Appeal Procedures." Many licensing statutes do not specifically provide for appeals. "N/A" indicates that no statute directly specifies procedures for appealing the denial of that particular license. This does not mean, however, that the applicant is without recourse. An arbitrary denial of licensure based on criminal history may usually be challenged in a court proceeding brought under Article 78 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules (CPLR). This type of proceeding usually requires the assistance of legal counsel.

For further information about a particular license, consult the issuing agency.

The study does not include a complete survey of State and City Civil Service positions or of municipal licenses. Nor does it include criminal record bars imposed in certain industries, such as the home health care or trucking industries. These bars may apply even to individuals with a license to work in that industry.

About the Legal Action Center

The Legal Action Center is a non-profit, public interest organization whose primary purpose is to combat discrimination based on a person's criminal record, history of drug or alcohol abuse, or HIV status. The Center does this by educating individuals, their counselors, and employers that such discrimination is illegal and by providing legal representation as well as policy advocacy.

For individuals with criminal records living in New York State, the Center provides advice about their rights and assists them to develop job-seeking strategies, helps them "clean up" their criminal records and obtain Certificates of Relief and Good Conduct, and provides legal representation to challenge illegal denial or termination of employment and licensure. The Center has helped many individuals obtain licenses as taxi drivers, social workers, nurses, doctors, insurance agents, locksmiths and teachers. The Center's staff also helps those who have suffered discrimination in areas such as medical care, housing, insurance, and access to government benefits.

The Center also provides services to organizations that work with individuals with criminal records, drug and alcohol problems and HIV/AIDS, including training, technical assistance, and representation on issues relating to discrimination and to the confidentiality of alcohol and drug abuse treatment records and HIV-related information.

The Center has a variety of publications for both counselors and clients about the rights of individuals with criminal records, drug and alcohol problems, and HIV/AIDS. The Center also plays a leading role in addressing public policy issues that are important to these communities.

The survey initially was conducted with funding from the New York State Department of Probation and Correctional Alternatives and was revised with funding from the New York State Division of Criminal Justice Services.
