

New Polling Details Kentuckians' Support for Prioritizing Care Over Criminalization When It Comes to Substance Use

Respondents nearly universally view substance use disorder (SUD) as a problem (99%), and more than two-thirds (68%) personally know someone impacted by substance use.

When asked how the government should adjust current spending on programs to prevent and treat SUD, 60% of respondents said the government should spend more, including 55% of Republicans, 65% of Democrats, and 62% of Independents.

Further, 77% of respondents shared that they agree with the statement, “We need to treat substance use more as a health problem and less as a criminal problem,” including 68% of Republicans, 84% of Democrats, and 80% of Independents.

Below is a table detailing demographic breakdowns in Kentuckians' support for actionable policy proposals to expand access to SUD prevention, treatment, and recovery services, both in communities and carceral settings, as well as other health-first strategies to reduce substance use-related harms and promote care over criminalization.
